

I cannot believe the FCC would even consider amending the do-not-call laws. The do not call list was the first law in a very long time that was about the consumer and not about business and corporations. If I want to buy something or get additional services from my bank, I know their number. As Americans we have enough distractions in our lives. So many so that the unity of the American family has suffered. We have enough demands on our time and each phone call we have to answer, whether it be from our bank or a telemarketer, is a few more precious minutes taken away from our children. Before the do-not-call list, you could not sit down for dinner with your family, help the kids with homework or just talk or watch tv together without answering the phone a dozen times from people trying to sell us junk we don't need anyway. If you open that door by allowing banks to call existing customers, every company that bought your name from some list, will be calling again. There is finally some peace and quiet at dinnertime. Please don't interrupt our meal by allowing this exemption to the do-not-call legislation.
